This invention relates generally to dental hand tools and more specifically to a cleaner for the working end of a drill. Abrasive rotary drills are in common use in dentistry for the various procedures in treating teeth. Typically, such a drill is provided with a detachable shank for setting in a chuck of a handpiece. The drill may also be provided with a disposable tips which are removed from the drill before its reuse. Abrasive material is normally removed from the working end of the drill by wiping it with a brush. However, the brush material is also eventually abraded by the repeated use of the drill during the course of the work. If the brush is incorporated in the drill in a disposable component that is separately replaceable, the brush material must be sufficiently durable to resist the abrasive material for several repeated uses of the drill. If the brush material is sufficiently durable, it is so abrasive as to be uncomfortable to the hand of the dentist. It is desirable that a cleaning apparatus be able to be attached to the working end of the drill, in place of the working end brushes, to allow the working end to be cleaned from time to time in the course of its use. It is further desirable that such a cleaning apparatus allow the tip to be cleaned and the working end to be wiped without the operator using any tools or other implements to manipulate the cleaning apparatus. A cleaning apparatus is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,027,595 in which a cleaning pad is pressed against the working end of a drill by a spring which is biased by a yieldable plate. The plate also carries a sharp point which extends across the plate, so that the plate is engaged by the point if the plate is urged against the working end of the drill.
